Gwytherin School Gwytherin School is a defunct school in the Gwynedd town of Dolgellau which served as the home for the children of the priest of the Gwytherin School in the 19th century. History Gwytherin School in Dolgellau, which opened in 1859, was in disarray when the senior school at Harlech closed in 1866. The previous headmaster at the school, who had been involved with the establishment of the school, relocated to Dolgellau and became the priest and curate of the St John the Evangelist Church. The school continued to hold classes, under his leadership. As a result of the Welsh School Boards Act 1869, the Council of the Board of Education ordered the establishment of a school specifically for the education of the children of the clergy. Gwytherin School was established at the school house and remained in place until the 1890s. Perhaps the glaring problem is that the author chose to write in nonstandard English? For example: "As the Queen stepped out of her highly anticipated caravan, the royals could hear the cheering crowds from afar but were unable to look back and see the queue of butterflies in their wake." or "However, given that the school board already professed they don't agree with the reading, it's unlikely that the reading will come before the elections." A: This sounds pretty standard to me (in that I'm not familiar with the extra words you've put in). "the queue of butterflies in their wake" is not the same as "the queue of butterflies in their behinds", that's just one or two more words added into the sentence. They don't sound contrived to me at all. Blank into a FALLOUT audience and the metal audience is as if even more just a step behind. (And the first person to say, "Well it's official, we're having a discussion about Fallout" will be the one.) There's a long, hard, very serious discussion going on inside. It's all this once more, with a twist of kind of a revolution.
